The stakes are high for Kingston, NY's varsity football team this season, as they confront a hypermasculine culture and redefine what it means to be men.

OVERVIEW

The docu-short Locker Room Talk follows the Kingston Tigers over the course of their football season, both on and off the field, as they seek the championship and redefine what it means to be men. Along the way, through the power of true storytelling, they face the cultural expectations of masculinity head-on and ultimately, share deeply personal stories about love, loss, and triumph. Whether or not the Tigers win the game, a bigger battle has been won: the team has changed the way they view women and themselves.

The goal of Locker Room Talk is to inspire men and boys to become empowered to speak up for themselves, each other, and in the face of violence against women. The stories, vulnerability, and bravery of the young men featured in the film will inspire change in other teams, high school and college students, and adults, making the world a freer and safer place for us all.

“Being able to talk to each other about what we’re really going through has made us all closer. It’s also helped to take a lot of stress away. I’ve learned that everyone is going through more than you know. Everyone, whether you can see it or not.”

– CHAPMAN PARKER, KINGSTON HIGH SCHOOL PARTICIPANT

SYNOPSIS

Kingston High School's football coach, Jeramie Collins, knows the epidemic of violence against women is systemic and that it's rooted in the hyper-masculine culture prevalent in sports. He's prepared to take action and is committed to paving a new way for his high school team. He's booked Tony Porter, the co-founder of the internationally-acclaimed organization, A CALL TO MEN, known for its effort to end violence against women by promoting a healthy, respectful version of manhood.

As the season begins, the Kingston Tigers are going to have the rare chance to work with Tony first hand and discover what they're missing by living inside what he calls The Man Box. But that's not all. Collins has also arranged for team members to take a true storytelling workshop with Hudson Valley-based storytelling nonprofit TMI Project, where the players will write deeply personal stories about being silenced by the cultural expectations of masculinity, and perform them on stage in front of hundreds of people. As the players' experiences and stories are intercut with interviews from NFL players, Mark Herzlich, Jonathan Stewart, and Curtis Martin, we see how these deep-rooted and devastating issues impact small-town boys, professional football players, and boys and men in between.

THE ORGANIZATIONS

TMI Project's mission is to help craft and amplify radically true stories to ignite human connection, challenge the status quo, and inspire both storytellers and listeners to take action for positive social change.

TMI Project teaches true storytelling workshops which culminate in live performances and digital content that focus on the "too much information" parts of a story typically left out because of shame, stigma, fear or cultural expectation. Programming is centered around four social justice initiatives: Anti-Racism, Gender Equality, LGBTQIA+ Rights, and Mental Health Awareness. The impact of their work is deepened with partnerships with schools, nonprofits, small businesses, and corporations. They work with directly impacted folks, students, emerging and veteran activists, and leaders; shining the spotlight on the stories that may not be featured in mainstream media or recognized in history books but have the power to change the world.

Since 2010, TMI Project has led more than 100 true storytelling workshops and staged live storytelling performances by nearly 2,000 storytellers, which have been presented to audiences of over 200,000 people in schools, colleges, prisons, mental health clinics, theaters, community centers, the United Nations and online.
